Reason for referral: Enlarging right adrenal adenoma for functional assessment

Dear Dr. Chen:

Kindly assess this patient for the above issue. She has a slow growing adrenal adenoma.

Thank you

Yours truly,

Dr. Kevin S. Moosar

Dear Dr. Fung:

Thank you for asking me to assess this 50-year-old woman with an enlarging right adrenal adenoma for an opinion. She was seen in the surgical clinic today unaccompanied.

The story is somewhat unclear. However, from what I gather, she had some nonspecific abdominal pain which led to an ultrasound examination in 2020 and a lesion was identified in the adrenal gland as well as the right kidney. She later underwent a CT scan followed by an MRI and later another CT scan.

The most recent CT scan shows the lesion to be approximately 3.6 cm x 3.1 cm showing slight increase in size. The consistency is adrenal adenoma.

On further questioning, she does not endorse any symptoms that would be suggestive of a functional adenoma. However, she does have some increased hirsutism recently. She has no palpitations, excessive sweating or headaches.

Her past medical history is remarkable for obesity and malignant hyperthermia. Her only medication is lorazepam as needed for panic attacks. She has no allergies to medications and she is a non-smoker.

Physical examination was noncontributory.

We discussed reasons for surgical removal of the adrenal gland namely, functional adrenal adenomas as well as enlarging lesions over the size of 4 cm. There has been marginal increase in size.

I have taken the liberty of referring her to one of my endocrinology colleagues for an opinion with regards to assessment for functional studies of the adrenal gland. Once this is completed, we can discuss further management when I see her in follow-up.
